McFARLAND

While there is no major league baseball team here in North Carolina, the all-out scramble of minor league ball is within easy reach of the McFarland offices. Most of us root for the Hickory Crawdads of the Sally League, and some follow one or more of the Carolina League teams. The words “Bull Durham” will stir up feelings of local loyalty from just about any of us.

And ever since Hank Utley and Scott Verner shared their manuscript on the independent Carolina Baseball League, I’ve been a fan of yet another Carolina baseball institution. I grew up in one of the small textile mill towns covered by their book, and I can attest that many facets of mill town life are still steeped in the rivalries formed decades ago between Depression-scarred mill towns. Although the teams were formed originally of millworkers and local talent, professional “outlaw” ringers were lured to the teams with the promise of higher wages, small-town hero worship, and good-paying offseason mill jobs. Utley and Verner’s description of the first game to use outlaws demonstrates the intense rivalry between the Kannapolis Towelers and the Concord Weavers:

By 90 minutes before game time, the house was packed in the steamy late-summer heat, fans spilling out of the stands to crowd right onto the playing field along both foul lines and all the way around the outfield. An hour before the game, all concession stands had sold out of food.

Many of the fans wore their Sunday best to the game, which had become an important social event in Concord. But some were ready for more than baseball. Some filled empty pop bottles with sand for use as weapons. Reports were rampant that the more rabid fans had brought knives and guns.

The first on-field argument came before the game started. The teams knew each other’s tricks well, and they couldn’t agree on rules for what would happen if, for example, a fair ball went into the crowd in the outfield with men on base. Also in dispute was whether fans along the foul lines were required to move to allow a player to catch a pop foul. Meanwhile, clouds were gathering overhead.

Finally the game started. Kannapolis scored two runs in the top of the first inning. In the bottom of the first, Concord batted, and a single drove in runners from second and third, appearing to tie the score. But according to news reports of the day, the plate umpire, after first allowing both Concord runs to count, then decided a ground rule had been violated and ordered the second runner back to third base.

That was all the provocation it took. Enraged fans poured out of the stands and from their places around the field toward home plate in a wild melee.

Just as quickly, the heavens emptied in violent summer storm, flooding Concord’s Webb Field with several inches of water in minutes, and the mob suddenly turned and started running for the gates. Harry Martin, retired Concord restaurateur and businessman, said, “I was ankle-deep in water before I could get out of the ballpark.” Lillian Stewart was standing on a hill outside the ballpark with friends. She says, “We were nearly drowned before we could move.”

Curiously, however, almost nowhere else had it rained a drop.

For more of this fascinating slice of history, see The Independent Carolina Baseball League (p. 31) and Outlaw Ballplayers (p. 31). To explore other of our authors’ interests in the minors, recent and notable books include The Los Angeles Angels of the Pacific Coast League (p.3), The Greatest Minor League: A History of the Pacific Coast League (p. 8), The New England League (p. 11) and Early Professional Baseball in Hampton Roads (p. 30). We’ve packed as many sports titles into this print catalog as we could manage...there are even more within the online catalog located at www.mcfarlandpub.com. Happy reading!
